

This condition is often difficult to distinguish from other follicular eruptions, but the typical appearance of the lesions, which are often accompanied by a purulent discharge, is characteristic of staphylococcal folliculitis. The condition is usually self-limiting and resolves spontaneously, but may require treatment with antibiotics if it persists or becomes severe.